I am hoping someone can respond to this post. My Dell inspiron had bit locker turned on but we never turned it on. I didn't even know what bit locker was until it asked me for the key one day this past January. After useless conversations with Dell who said they couldn't help, I gave up and my computer has sat for a year locked.

Basically my point being is that no, it is not against the rules, but typically many planet fitness gyms I have been to (I travel across state for work and stay in that city for 2 days a week so I have been to a couple different planet fitness gyms in my state) have had ample places to change in private so they basically "encourage" that more than changing in the open.

The locker wasn't actually touching the compartment, since i wouldn't have been able to construct it in the first place like that. there was a visible gap between. it was apparently just "too close";.
